PROGRAM NOTES

Alberto Ginastera is the most representative composer of Argentina.

He transformed folk reference into a structural element, tracing the evolution found in the works of composers who relied on folk sources such as Bartok or Kodaly. In his music strong rhythms, folk-like thematic material, and the influence of nature are incorporated into a strong architectural design.

THREE PRELUDES

These Preludes – Preludio rockero, Preludio triston and Candombe en mi, reflect the rich musical heritage of Buenos Aires, providing a mecca for composers throughout the 20th Century. They express the melancholic sensibility of this city through the universal voice of the guitar.

SONATA FOR GUITAR

Three categories of folk elements are present in Ginastera's Sonata for Guitar, op. 47. Characteristics of the criollo folk guitar tradition and of the guitar itself play important roles in the construction of the piece. Elements of the andino cantos like the baguala and the vidala, as well as the use of the caja, are used in the development of important thematic material. Finally, the malambo and other criollo folk dances are used to generate the rhythms of the energetic closing movement.

CRIOLLA

The Criolla is the third piece from the series Pieces op. 6. It has been composed in Ginastera is typical toccata writing, putting into academic means the folk elements taken from the malambo dance. In the middle section, he made the quotation: "They say the rivers grow after the rain, that is the way my love grows when you're away", ending in a strong, vigorous finale of glissandi.

SONATA No. 1 op. 22 FOR PIANO

After 1945 Ginastera reached his maturity and, although his music was still imbued with folk elements, these were now considerably more subtle and more integrated into the composer's thinking in a way comparable to Bartók's so-called 'imaginary folklore'. This is the case for his three piano sonatas (1952, 1981 and 1983).

The Piano Sonata No.1 Op.22 is amongst Ginastera's masterpieces. Commissioned by Carnegie Institute and Pennsylvania College for Women, it is the composer's only piano piece related to Subjective Nationalism. In a symbolic musical language, folk and regional traits are melted in a highly universal language.

The sonata is traced in four movements, the first one, Allegro Marcato is written in the classical Sonata form. Its opening theme, very primitive, is followed by the second theme, more pastoral like. The typical features are still polytonal elements and complex rhythms. The second movement, Presto Misterioso is a fleeting, vaporous three part scherzo where Ginastera uses a twelve-tone series for the first part and the second one conveys the folk reminiscences of a malambo. The third movement, Adagio Molto Appassionato is a three part lied reflecting the spirit of the landscape of North Argentina, with Ginastera's entirely personal accent. And the fourth movement, Ruvido ed ostinato in rondo form with five sections, is an example of Ginastera's typical toccata writing.

CANTATA FOR THE MAGIC AMERICA

Alberto Ginastera's Cantata para America Mágica (1960) is a great work inspired by ancient pre-Columbian texts, travels in six scenes from the world's creation to its destruction, an idea again explored in Popol Vuh. It evokes the Mesoamerican world in three ways: quotations of Mayan and Aztec texts; sonic references to indigenous music, and most impressively, the use of serialist techniques to symbolise the symmetrical, cyclical nature of the Mayan world view.

The layout of the six movements represents a cycle, with the first and sixth movements illustrating creation (quoting Popol Vuh) and destruction (Chilam Balam), and are symmetric, with the second and fifth movements being soliloquies using similar rows. More symbolically, the combinatorial D-hexachord represents destruction: it is the sonority of the climax of the work, when the prophecy of destruction is proclaimed. This chord is also the progenitor of all eight rows used in the Cantata through transposition, inversion, rotation, and repartition. Hence, the D-hexachord represents both creation and destruction, making it symbolic of the Mesoamerican concept of a cyclical universe, where one world was destroyed so that another may arise.

Sonic references to indigenous music are made by a percussion ensemble including the Aztec ceremonial drums teponaxtle and huehuetl, the latter evoked by timpani; shifting, odd-numbered metric groupings reminiscent of indigenous drum syllables; and ornamental vocalisations.
